Injury Claims and workplace injuries are often physically and emotionally hard because the injured individual must pursue an injury claim while likewise suffering from the injury.

Under the workers insurance system, workers are given guaranteed compensation for accepted claims in exchange for giving up their right to file a suit against work-related injuries. The employer finances the program through premiums. This is of benefit to the employer, who is given protection from court cases under this system of collective liability. Injured personnel together with their families are given just compensation, while expenses are spread among employers.

Nonetheless, employees can sue employers in certain circumstances. Employees may take legal action against employers in industries which are exempt from the workers insurance system. Workers could take legal action against fellow staff if they were "outside the course of their employment" when the injury happened. An employee could be entitled to benefits under the insurance plan with respect to an injury or disease, and can likewise be entitled to take legal action against an individual in respect of the injury; for instance, a person driving in the course of their employment could file a suit against the driver of the vehicle that injured them.
