Both the Provincial Family Court and the Supreme Court, interim orders for child support, custody, and access can be obtained. Normally, these orders are acquired at the beginning of the case, while remaining active until the proceedings have ended. Often, an interim order is granted for one spouse to have complete possession of a some family asset. Therefore, the person is ordered to either sell the possession or to maintain possession of it.

Regrettably, even with the efforts being made by the Supreme Court and the Provincial Family Court, family cases still take many months to close.
