Wrongful Dismissal Lawyers Chilliwack - You could lose your job or get demoted while your life crumbles apart with just a snap of your employees fingers. It could become very difficult to support your family as your savings dwindle if you can't find gainful job. If this is you, it is possible that you have a wrongful dismissal situation against your employer.

If you are a boss that wants to fire someone but do not want to encounter a lawsuit. There are several vital questions which you need answered and a wrongful dismissal lawyer can help answer them.

A lawyer specializing in wrongful dismissal can give several of the answers or advice that will help you through your difficult case. Our firm prides itself in making sure that your rights are protected while helping you achieve your personal objectives.

If you go to court for a wrongful dismissal, you can be compensated by the courts for the amounts you would have been given according to your prior benefits and salary. Then again, whatever pay or notice which you got is subtracted from the awarded amount.

It is your responsibility to search for a job after your position is terminated. The court considers your efforts, but would likewise subtract whichever wages earned during the reasonable notice period from the awarded amount.

For example: If you just received eight weeks notice before termination when you were entitled to 8 months notice, the court would calculate the amount you could have earned at a new employment and award damages accordingly. The courts consider moving expenses, stock options, vacation pay, bonuses, pension, insurance and medical plans when determining how much damages they must award.

In the more extreme cases, courts can compensate you for whichever abuse which takes place after termination comprising mental distress, defamation or abuse.
